

Video TranscriptDanny Yeung video

As an entrepreneur, I love all parts of it. I think the parts of reason why you become an entrepreneur is for that uncertainty.

It's not safe, it's the thrill of it. There's a lot of risks involved. You never know if something is going to really work until you actually put it out to the market but you also get lots of success from all the up and down moments.

I've started four companies from scratch in the last twenty years. Myself as an individual, I'm always looking for new challenges, always trying to create impact and always trying to impact people's health.

I always believe you can't change anything in the past. You can always look forward into the future.

Even a lot of learnings, whether it's mistakes, failures, etc. really shaped to myself being where I am today.

What excites me the most is actually seeing a group of individuals that are tackling the worlds biggest problems, whether its healthcare, sustainability, climate-wise, as well as even health foods.

So this is all problems that we all individuals need to collaboratively and together solve.